Peru from Peru

Peru promotes gender equality in the coffee sector, strengthening women's professional capacity and leadership in almost half of the growing zones.

Advantages of associating

Peruvian producers own about 10,000 small farms of between 0.5 and 1 hectare. The families that cultivate them are the most vulnerable link in the production chain. By associating, small and medium producers can access better terms of market participation and gain bargaining power. This can mean better economic, social and living conditions for them and their families. It is also an effective way to formalize the supply chain and generate production volumes that are attractive and profitable for buyers.

Regions with personality

From the weather conditions, the altitude and the rich soils, each Peru province has its own personality for the production of high quality coffee that are perfect for consumers' looking for unique sensory experiences.

The advantages of the non-harvest season

The harvest season in Peru is from March to September. During this period, the coffee plants are dormant and the weather is ideal for processing and drying the coffee beans.

During the non-harvest season, producers can focus on other activities such as marketing, quality control and administrative tasks.

This period is also ideal for training and capacity building for producers and workers.

The non-harvest season is a key period for the coffee sector in Peru.
